PROFILE

I specialize in providing psychotherapy to assist adults with coping and adjustment following many types of loss and life transitions such as trauma, death, physical injury, and chronic pain/illness. I have considerable experience guiding people through the natural grief/mourning processes that often accompany these difficult life events and helping facilitate the discovery/creation of new meaning and a renewed sense of purpose. In addition to challenging our coping resources, significant life transitions often offer us an opportunity to gain fresh perspective on, and reconnect with, what we most value in our lives.

In my current practice, I also address a range of adult mental health issues, including anxiety/PTSD, depression, and stress-related concerns. I assist individuals in identifying recurring problematic patterns in their lives and relationships and then acquiring the tools and developing the skills to help themselves alter those patterns. In a collaborative fashion, I work with people to create a personalized treatment plan with an emphasis on cultivating healthy awareness skills. Particular attention is devoted to building on existing strengths / personal resources and incorporating specific goals for change.

I offer a balance of support and gentle, respectful challenge; an approach that facilitates the development of increased mindfulness and self-awareness, important precursors to responding to life experiences in a skillful manner (rather than relating from automatic/habitual emotional reactions). Between-session exercises are co-created, in keeping with the philosophy (and solid research findings) that lasting change requires not only new awareness, but also regular experiential practice, in-the-moment, as we face personally challenging situations.
